ROY DOBBS, former owner of the Citizen's State Bank in Camas, was one of many gaily dressed Camas residents celebrating the Spree of '83 thirty years ago this summer. Dobbs, who organized the Spree parade is fourth from left in the back row. A notice in the Camas Post urged everyone to be in front of the bank for a "mob scene." During the wild Spree some 200 of these and other Camas "frontiersmen" formed a caravan of 50 cars and invaded a Portland wrestling match at the civic auditorium. The picture was taken while the town was whooping it up before Spree Days which were June 23 and 24, 1933. (Can you identify anybody in the picture?) The picture was found in a chest of drawers by a Puyallup furniture dealer who took it to Ronald Crowe, a bank vice president there. Seeing Camas written on the back of the pi[illegible] Crowe sent it to Dee Laird of National Bank of Commerce about two years ago.
